Introduction

In general, the company's goal is to get a number of profits to maintain the continuity of its business for development and growth. For this purpose to be achieved, all activities that take place within the company and existing functions must be carried out properly and in a controlled manner. Promotion is one of the functions that help determine the company's success in facing increasingly fierce competition in the business world today where all of that is inseparable from the costs of promotion itself (Belch & Belch, 2003).

Companies must provide attractive products and guaranteed quality, set selling prices, promotional activities in order to achieve the expected goals (McDonald & Wilson, 2016). To achieve success the company must direct its business activities to produce products that can provide satisfaction to consumers and profits for the company.

Marketing system is one of several management activities that have an important role because it is direct support to the company's activities and also to the sales volume to obtain optimal profits from maximum sales results. (Ricks et al., 2000). In overcoming the intense competition in sales, the company needs to work on a promotion strategy. Promotional activities aim to increase the company's sales and market share which is determined by direct communication that will later influence consumers in meeting their needs, especially tastes, satisfaction and things that are used as guidelines or guidelines when conducting marketing.

Activities undertaken to market products are activities carried out by entrepreneurs after the product is finished being produced. This is not the case because the activity to make the product acceptable, actually must be planned before so that the product can really be in accordance with the needs and desires of the market. If the product does not match the needs or tastes of the market, the product will not be accepted by the market. Marketing activities can run according to their objectives, it requires managerial activities because marketing activities that are well planned, organized, coordinated, and supervised will produce satisfying results (Armstrong, 2001).

Every company certainly wants to maintain that continuity or survival is guaranteed, therefore a marketing role is needed. Marketing is the main element in increasing sales value. Furthermore, it should be added that marketing is not only directed at supporting sales activities, to obtain optimal profits but also promotional activities are needed. The role of promotion is one aspect that plays a role in marketing activities.

Sales promotion

Sales promotion is the company's activity to market products that are marketed in such a way that consumers will easily see it and even by means of certain placements and arrangements, the product will attract consumers' attention (Folkes & Matta, 2004). In a heavy equipment shop that promotes heavy equipment that it sells aloft is expected to attract the attention of prospective buyers.

Another way to be seen is to install the product in a shop window that is easily seen by people and even equipped with certain decorations so that it will attract the attention of prospective buyers. Another form that is included in this sales promotion is by giving product samples to potential customers. Product samples or samples are given to visitors for free in the hope that they will become interested and happy to use the product.

Promotion purpose

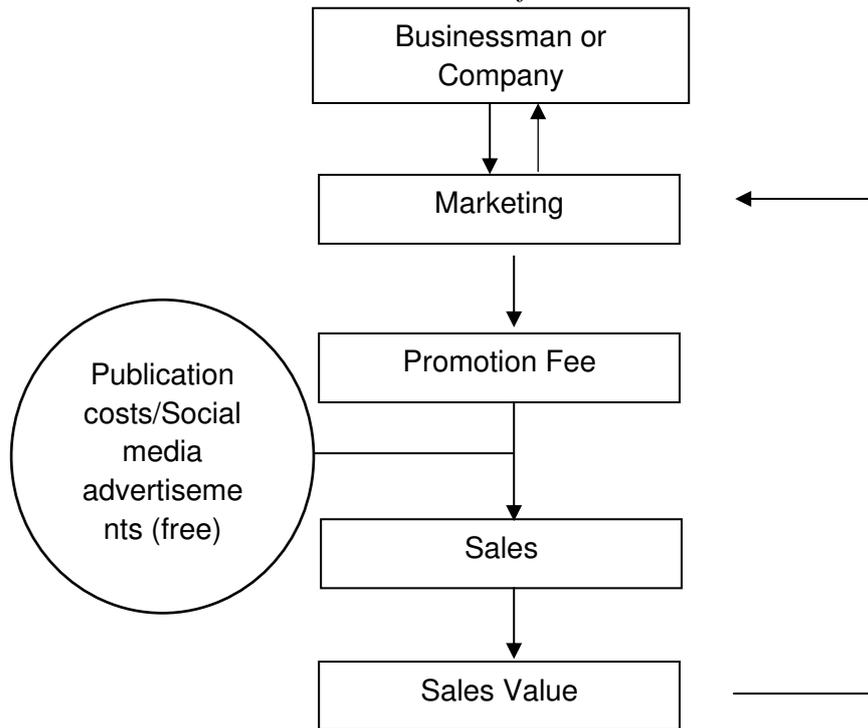

The purpose of advertising for an item will depend on the stage in the product life cycle. Usually, the promotion is done to: give buyers awareness about the existence of the new product; encouraging the distribution of new brands; showing buyers with a reason for buyers of new products. All of this is aimed at maintaining the market position of the product (Peter et al., 1999). New buyers may come from rival brand buyers and then a greater level of use can occur if the company always reminds buyers to use its brand or can also tell buyers about the new use of their products.

Promotional mix

Modern marketing requires more than developing good products, setting competitive prices and allowing them to reach targeted customers. The company must also be able to communicate with existing and potential customers.

But what he communicates, it should not be left alone. In order to communicate effectively, companies must use advertising agencies to develop effective advertising, sales promotion and public relations specialists.
